

Chow Line

News from the College of Food, Agricultural, and Environmental Sciences

7 ways to make food donations count

During this time of year, I often make donations to food drives for local pantries. I normally just take older items from my pantry that I haven't found a use for, but I wonder if instead I should be buying new. Are there guidelines I should be following?

As long as the food is safe for human consumption, your local food pantry will likely be grateful for the donation, especially these days.

According to a U.S. Department of Agriculture report released in September, an estimated 14 percent of American households were food insecure at some point during 2014. That includes 5.6 percent experiencing "very low food security," which means that one or more household members went without food at times because they didn't have enough money or other resources for food. In Ohio, 7.5 percent of households experienced very low food security — worse than every state except for Arkansas, Maine and Missouri. As a result, food pantries report increased demand and, of course, the need for increased donations.

Here are some ideas found on several organizations' websites to increase the chances that your donations are worthwhile:

- Consider focusing on shelf-stable sources of protein. Examples include peanut butter; beans, either canned or dried; trail mix or nuts; canned chili, soups or stews; and canned tuna, salmon or chicken.
- Pantry staples, such as rice, pasta, flour, cereal, canned vegetables, tomato sauce and cooking oils are always welcome. If you can spring for healthier options, such as whole-grain pasta, brown rice, high-fiber low-sugar cereal and low-

photo: iStock

sodium vegetables, all the better.

- At this time of year, think about items for holiday meals: canned yams, cranberry sauce, boxed stuffing, instant mashed potatoes — even green beans, mushroom soup and dried onion rings.
- Refrain from donating anything in glass jars, torn packages or in cans that are rusted, dented, or (heaven forbid) bulging. Food pantries generally can't accept foods that are past their expiration date, but they take foods less than a year past a "best by" date. If you're not certain, ask.
- Most pantries prefer not to distribute junk food such as candy, chips and soft drinks. Limit the donation of such foods.
- Some pantries also distribute personal care items, such as deodorant, shampoo and conditioner, bar soap, body wash, toilet paper, and toothpaste and toothbrushes.
- Finally, consider donating money instead of products. Food pantries can use monetary donations to purchase items from regional food banks, which in turn use donations for their own purchases. For example, the Mid-Ohio Foodbank reports that it can turn $1 in donated cash into $10 worth of food and groceries to feed the hungry. It may not feel as satisfying as clearing out your pantry, but monetary donations can go a long way to help alleviate the plight of those who need a helping hand.

Nov. 24, 2015

By Martha Filipic
614-292-9833
filipic.3@osu.edu

Editor: This column was reviewed by Irene Hatsu, Ohio State University Extension state specialist in Food Security. This week's column is being sent out a few days early, ahead of the Thanksgiving holiday.

Chow Line is a service of the College of Food, Agricultural, and Environmental Sciences and its outreach and research arms, Ohio State University Extension and the Ohio Agricultural Research and Development Center. Send questions to Chow Line, c/o Martha Filipic, 2021 Coffey Road, Columbus, OH 43210-1043, or filipic.3@osu.edu.

College Marketing and Communications
2021 Coffey Road
Columbus, OH 43210-1043
614-292-2011

208 Research Services Building
1680 Madison Ave.
Wooster, OH 44691-4096
330-263-3780

© 2015, The Ohio State University

CFAES provides research and related educational programs to clientele on a nondiscriminatory basis. For more information: go.osu.edu/cfaesdiversity.